7 Ways to Save Money With Interprovincial Moving Companies

Relocation of a business from one province to another might be challenging in terms of budget management, as all tasks related to it will require additional funding: packing equipment, furniture and goods, transporting it to its destination, etc. It is particularly important for medium-sized and small Canadian enterprises to keep an eye on their expenditures.

The services of interprovincial movers become quite handy if you start preparing for the move in advance and find the most suitable companies.

Here is a list of seven tips to minimize costs when working with interprovincial moving companies.

1. Plan Your Move Well in Advance

Last minute arrangements may result in less flexibility in terms of the options available for comparison. Early planning enables you to make requests for quotations, gather packing material, and determine an appropriate date for moving your company.

You should ideally plan four to eight weeks ahead of your desired relocation date, if possible. This is especially important for larger offices and businesses that have heavy machinery.

This checklist includes:

- Moving date and destination.
- Office furniture, equipment, and inventory.
- Packing supplies and labor.
- Transportation and storage services.

2. Compare Quotes Before Making a Decision

It might be tempting to go for the least expensive offer because it will save money, but the lowest quote may not necessarily include all the services that you need.

Get written estimates from several interprovincial moving companies. See which services are included in their estimates, whether it is loading, unloading, packing, transporting and extra fees.

- Before you make any arrangements, ask these questions:
- Is the estimate binding or is it adjustable?
- Do fuel surcharges come along with the offer?
- Are there other fees in case your moving involves stairs, long haul or bulky goods?
- What are the policies regarding payments and cancellations?

An estimate is always helpful for the purpose of comparing different services and saving money on moving day.

3. Remove Unwanted Items Before Packing

Moving objects which you no longer need could influence your transportation costs. You should check all your offices and inventory rooms prior to relocating.

Sell all unnecessary desks, give away useful pieces of furniture, shred all papers, and throw away all damaged appliances. The same could be done by e-commerce enterprises.

Fewer things to transport can lead to fewer things to pack and a reduced transport load depending on how the mover charges for the job.

These interprovincial movers will be able to focus on moving only your equipment and other stuff.

4. Pack What You Can Safely Handle

Packing will help save time; however, you can consider handling items that are easy to pack to save on labor cost.

The employees will be responsible for packing non-fragile office supplies, books, documents, and other items kept at your desk before moving day. Ensure that the boxes are tough and label each box and organize your items per department/rooms.

However, leave the handling of your computer, other electronic gadgets, machines, and any other expensive equipment to your employees.

5. Choose a Moving Date That Fits Your Budget

The date that you choose to move can be an influencing factor on the price of the move and the availability of movers. For instance, there is usually greater demand for movers during weekends, month ends, and busy months.

Should your company be somewhat flexible, try inquiring from interprovincial moving companies what dates are available and whether changing your schedule will make the move cheaper.

For instance, choosing an off-peak time of moving can give you greater availability compared to choosing a busy month end.

Also plan your move in such a way that it does not conflict with your work schedules.

6. Organize Furniture and Equipment Before Moving Day

Bad preparation can cause time wastage during loading/unloading. In case movers have to look for information from unmarked boxes or wait for workers to get the work area ready, then the process will take longer.

Create a simple checklist and tick the boxes based on where they should go depending on the room in the house. Keep business files, keys, laptops, and other items that will be used immediately separate.

If you are moving furniture, know the desks, shelving units, and cabinets that must be taken apart. You may ask the movers if disassembly and reassembly is part of the estimated cost.

Professional home movers and business relocation experts can offer various moving services, however, owners must understand what kind of services they need. Team movers, who get clear instructions, will work faster and help to avoid unnecessary delays.

7. Ask About Combined Services and Storage Options

Some companies require not only transport services but additional activities as well. Packing, storing, transporting furniture or other goods and delivering them to several addresses can be what you need. Consult the interprovincial moving companies concerning the possibility of providing all these services together and see if it might turn out to be a better deal compared to booking them separately.

Storing may be useful when you are moving into an unprepared place. But don’t forget about the costs of storing, access conditions, and the minimum time of rental.

Final Thoughts

Ways of saving money during the relocation of a business begin with proper planning and budgeting, as well as effective communication. This is achieved by reducing unnecessary items, requesting quotes from different companies, packaging appropriate items by yourself, and selecting an ideal date to move.

Top moving companies that deal with interprovincial moves will inform you about their services and answer all of your questions regarding the cost involved.
